Abstract	This paper aims to analyze about China's change of response toward North Korea's nuclear test. In this paper, there are three important points of discussion. The first discussion will be explained about the beginning and the progress of China and North Korea's relations. The second discussion is about China's response toward North Korea's nuclear test under Hu Jintao's leadership. The last discussion is about how and why the response of China toward North Korea nuclear program changed under Xi Jinping's leadership. This paper use qualitative method with the secondary data, and use the Foreign Policy Making Theory with the Bilateral Relations concept to the research of those discussion. The result of this analysis shows that there four determinants that influence China's change of response toward North Korea's nuclear test, they are international context, decision maker, domestic politics, and economy and military condition.
