Abstract	Objectivity has become the basis for the practice of contemporary journalism. Objectivity has become a major issue during the last century. However, the ethical debate about objectivity was never finished. Even the debate that starts from the definition of objectivity itself, the criteria, until the question of pessimism, is it possible there is objectivity in this world? Along with the increasing number of criticisms of objective journalism, the idea of subjective journalism increasingly widely accepted. Subjective journalism often simply interpreted as journalism in context. That is, journalists do not merely present the facts, but also presents the meaning. This paper tries to elaborate the notion of subjective journalism and explore its relevance in contemporary journalism.
